We have Stolen His Land. Now We Must Steal His Limb: The Nineteenth Newsletter (2019).
Dear Friends,

When you see South Africa today, you cannot help but be shocked into realizing how — as a people, as a society, on a global scale — we are reaping the inevitable consequences of that 1913 massacre. Despite the forty-year timeline, the government takes major responsibility for the Marikana massacre. And why? The government has the moral, political, and economic responsibility to protect the lives of all its citizens. But did they do so? Did they live up to their responsibilities? The government’s response to Marikana is symbolic of the government’s response to the lives of all its citizens. The government’s response to Marikana is symbolic of the government’s response to the lives of all its citizens.

This is the context of 2014. The deaths at Marikana, and the ongoing deaths in South Africa, are part of a wider context. In 2014, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.

On that same day, the government of South Africa released a report on the deaths of those who died in the Marikana massacre. The report concluded that the deaths were the result of violence by police, and that the government was not responsible. The report also concluded that the government had not taken adequate steps to prevent the deaths. The report was released on 2014-07-14.